Ann teaches undergraduate and graduate social research methods and statistical analysis. “I love the ‘aha’ moment when students realize how relevant sociology is to their daily lives. I am convinced the social research methods and statistical analysis increases their human capital in ways that enhance their career choices.”

Her research interests focus on the environment and society, and she chooses to work in the sociology department because, “my colleagues are phenomenal academicians. They are invested in bringing their research interests to the classroom in ways that attract student interest and involvement.”
